Benchmarking e-government in web 2.0

Discussion: what are the strategic goals and how to measure the achievements of e-gov.

Back from ENISA summer school on security and privacy

Monday I presented at ENISA (European Network and Informaton Security Agency) summer school
It was very interesting to be mixed with the security community – while I know very little of it. I presented how differently security and trust are managed in government 2.0 applications, basically emphasizing the importance of self-regulation and soft governance. I also referred to the recent decision of the US government to allow third party authentication (e.g. OpenID) on government websites. This was perfect, because just before me, a representative of the Austrian government presented their eID system, super secure, available to all the population but used only by 3%
So I thought about the following visualization – which I did not have time to add in my presentation

Anyway here is my presentation

CROSS POSTING FROM THE OPEN DECLARATION BLOG My manifesto (author “osimod”, title “second version”) has a specific priority on skills and education, which is missing in others. I also wrote here on the topic. In my opinion, public services 2.0 can happen only with educated citizens and civil servants. Why? On the supply side, you need educated people to crea [...]
